Enclosed is your copy of Historic Preservation: A Plan for Connecticut (Volume II: The Inventory). This volume has been prepared to afford citizens and planning agencies a reference guide to the most critical historic resources in the State of Connecticut. Volume II is intended to inform the general public and to alert all levels of government to the existence of sensitive historic resources which should be taken into account when planning projects in the immediate vicinity of a listed site. This book has been arranged to provide convenient reference for nearly 4,000 historic sites and structures. Instructions for the use of Volume II are included in the Preface.

This volume represents those historic resources surveyed by the Connecticut Historical Commission to June, 1974. Because historical survey work is a continual process, the number of inventoried resources is constantly increasing. Historic sites surveyed between June, 1974, and June, 1975, will be listed in the Annual Preservation Program for 1976, to be issued next June.

We will appreciate your bringing to our attention any sites which have been demolished or referenced inaccurately in this volume.

Sincerely,

Stephen J. Raiche

PREFACE: HOW TO USE VOLUME II

This publication is a concise abstract of the historic resources inventory of the Connecticut Historical Commission, including sites which have been surveyed to June, 1974. Each entry represents a particular historical, architectural, or archaeological resource in Connecticut. It is the purpose of Volume II to provide the National Park Service, planning officials, other government agencies, and concerned citizens a brief list of sites which are worthy of consideration for preservation. Inclusion of a site in this volume does not necessarily indicate that the resource should be preserved intact. Rather, listing suggests that certain resources possess qualities which are historically unique or architecturally distinctive, and that these variables should be considered by project planners when proposing alternative land uses.

Volume II encompasses individual sites and districts of historical or architectural importance. In addition, a preliminary list of subterranean archaeological (pre-historic) sites has been included. All sites have been presented in alphabetical order by historical theme (association with a common period, movement, historical phenomenon, or architectural tradition), and geographically by county and town. The thematic breakdown enables the reader to examine a broad field of common sites, regardless of location. The geographical section is useful to alert planners to the existence of sensitive historic resources within specific project areas. A key to interpreting each entry is provided on the following page.

Although complete data has not been recorded for every site, sufficient information is available to allow a positive identification. Additional information, including completed survey data sheets and record photographs, are available from the Connecticut Historical Commission.

KEY:

- (1) the county in which the resource is located.
- (2) the town in which the resource is located.
- (3) the accepted site name as recorded in the Historical Commission survey, and recognized locally. If a site name is unknown, the functional type of the structure or site is recorded.

- ④ the historical theme classification(s) which best typify the surveyed resource(see page iii).
- ⑤ (NRHP) indicates the resource is enrolled on the National Register of Historic Places.
(NHL) indicates the resource is a National Historical Landmark.
- ⑥ the precise location of a resource within a given community, if known and recorded.
- ⑦ underlined site name indicates public ownership of the resource.
- ⑧ a concise description of the resource, including architectural description, construction dates, historical or cultural associations, famous events, modifications to the original fabric.

Description of thematic classifications:

- 1) Seventeenth Century Architecture (Ar-17): Those structures which were erected in the seventeenth century, or derive their primary significance as representative of Connecticut architecture during the years 1600 to 1700.
- 2) Eighteenth Century Architecture (Ar-18): Those structures which were erected in the eighteenth century, or derive their primary significance as representative of Connecticut architecture during the years 1700 to 1800.
- 3) Nineteenth Century Architecture (Ar-19): Those structures which were erected in the nineteenth century, or derive their primary significance as representative of Connecticut architecture during the years 1800 to 1900.
- 4) Twentieth Century Architecture (Ar-20): Those structures which were erected in the twentieth century, or derive their primary significance as representative of Connecticut architecture since 1900.
- 5) Connecticut's Contribution to the Arts and Literature (ARTS): Sites and structures which have historical associations with recognized literary or artistic persons.
- 6) Industrial Architecture and Archaeology (IA): Sites and structures, mill buildings, and factory complexes which are representative of historical manufacturing or transportation processes, and which maintain substantial historical integrity. Theme also includes ruins of industrial sites which are able to be interpreted archaeologically.

- 7) Military History (Mil): Those sites upon which battles have been fought, or military posts have been established.
- 8) Social and Ethnic History of Connecticut (S&E): Those sites and structures which exemplify the development of social, political educational, and and recreational lifestyles in Connecticut.
- 9) Agriculture and Natural Conservation (Ag): Those sites, structures, or open spaces, which exemplify the development of the science of agriculture, or the conservation of natural areas in Connecticut.
- 10) Religious History and Architecture (Rel): Those sites and structures which exemplify the religious history and architecture of Connecticut.
- 11) Commemorative Site (C): Any site, structure, object, or open space upon which some noteworthy event has occurred, although the site itself need not have intrinsic design or historic merit.
- 12) Aboriginal History (AH): Those archaeological sites which are associated with aboriginal cultures in Connecticut, especially during the period prior to contact with European cultures.

MAJOR TRADITIONS IN CONNECTICUT ARCHITECTURE

These introductory remarks discuss in some detail the evolution and identifying characteristics of the various architectural styles and periods to be found in the state of Connecticut. The plans, photographs and descriptions that follow are drawn from existing structures and will serve as guides to those interested in protecting the visual and historic character of their respective communities. And since the bulk of the buildings inventoried as part of Volume II study were residential structures, the emphasis in style descriptions will be on the domestic architecture of the region.

Since the original settling of Connecticut in the 1630's, six major architectural traditions in Connecticut building have been developed - (1) the Colonial, "Saltbox", or "Plain Style", (2) the Georgian Style, (3) the Federal or Romanesque Style, (4) the Greek Revival, (5) the numerous so-called "Victorian" styles, including the entire range of late 19th century architecture, and (6) the styles of the 20th century from the Georgian Revival to modern commercial and public architecture. Within these general styles, many sub-styles exist, and in some instances overlap chronologically. It is this variety within the major styles that contributes to the architectural quality and continuity that must be identified, recorded and protected. Each of the major styles and their sub-categories will be discussed in chronological order, beginning with the 17th century one-room house.

THE COLONIAL STYLE

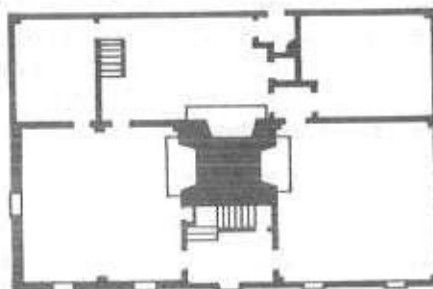

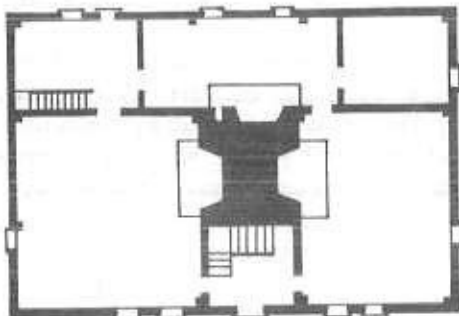

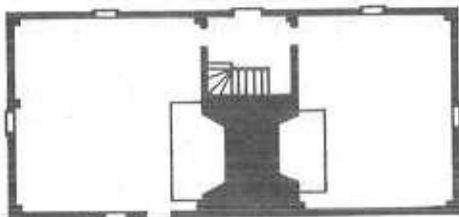

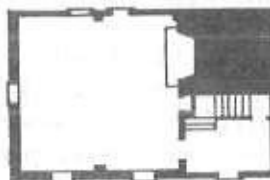

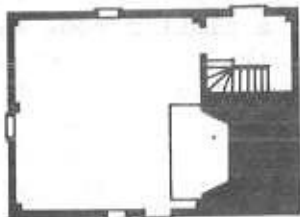

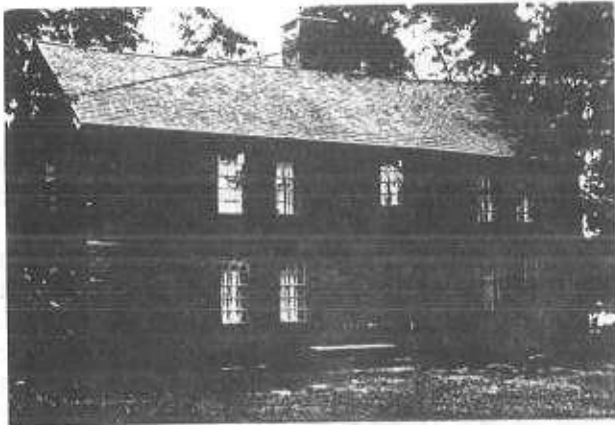

The Colonial style of domestic building, which includes the earliest houses in the state and continues through to the simple farm houses of the 1780's, can be conveniently divided into six major phases.

The first of these phases is the one-room house of the middle and late 17th century. Usually one and one-half stories in height, the plan of the house was dominated by a massive chimney in one end wall. Although no houses of this plan remain in an unaltered state, there survives in southeastern Connecticut two of the most important examples of this type in the original portions of the Thomas Lee House (NRHP) in East Lyme and the Hempstead House (NRHP) in New London. The Lee House, begun in 1664, was added to in three stages, as illustrated. The house began as a simple one-room dwelling, with the chimney forming part of the west wall. In the second stage, a similar room was added to the west of the chimney, which had a second hearth cut into it at this time. Finally, a three-room lean-to was added to provide a kitchen and pantry and the chimney was rebuilt where the stairs were formerly located. The Hempstead House, begun in 1678, evolved in much the same manner, and both of these houses are representative of the extremely plain, practical style of building that was carried on by the earliest settlers in Connecticut.

J. Frederick Kelly attributes this austerity to the fact that as the "Colonists were never free from the menace of wolf, famine, or lurking Indian, there was never time for anything non-essential nor place for anything flimsy and impermanent. The staunch houses which they built unconsciously expressed these circumstances in every timber of their tremendous frames.

Both of these houses faced south, which was typical of the 17th century houses, but the Lee House, because of the relocation of a road, was reoriented to face north in its final stage, with the ell placed across what was originally the front of the house.

A logical extension of this style was the two-room plan, with both rooms flanking the central chimney, and the second stages of both the Lee and the Hempstead Houses serve as examples of this type of plan.

1: Thomas Lee House, begun in 1664, East Lyme; and first-floor plan evolution, after Kelly.

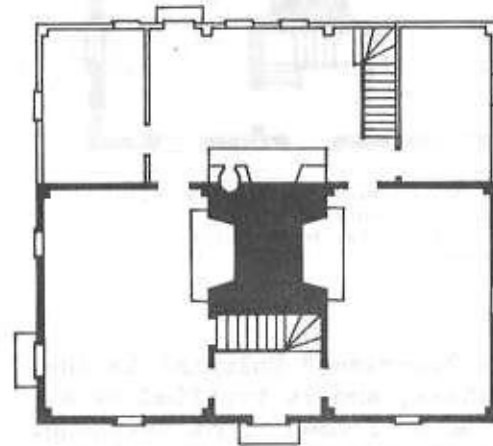

2: Hempstead House, begun in 1678, New London; and first-floor plan evolution, after Kelly.

The second phase of Colonial building was the two and one-half story, two-room-deep plan. The plan revolves around the central chimney which incorporates a fireplace for each of the three rooms on the first floor. Excellent examples of this type exist throughout the state, and include most of the rural houses that dot the countryside.

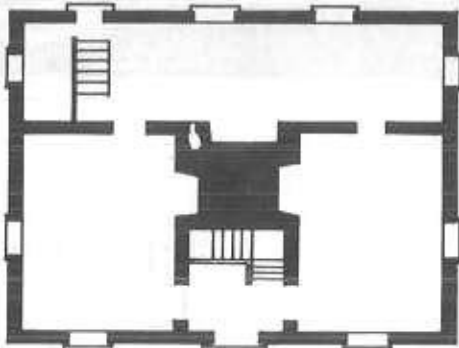

3: Center-chimney plan house on Rathbun Hill Road, Salem.

The third phase was actually created by adding a rear ell to an existing two-room plan house of earlier vintage. This simple attempt to gain extra space gave us one of the most distinctive early American architectural building forms - the Saltbox. In almost all of the early Saltbox houses the rear ell contained the kitchen, a "borning" room and a pantry. Often, an enclosed rear stair to the upper sleeping quarters was also included. The original version of the Saltbox had the lean-to addition framed into the existing structure, and this is evidenced by a break in the roof line, where the pitch of the ell is usually raised to provide head room. Many variations of the Saltbox house exist, including a second addition to the lean-to, and finally the rear ell or lean-to was built as part of the original house. In this later example, there is usually no break in the roof line, but this is not always the case.

4: "Saltbox" house on Potash Hill Road, Sprague; and first-floor plan of a similar house, after Kelly.

The fourth phase of Colonial building is the one and one-half story, two-room-deep cottage. Nostalgically referred to as the "Cape Cod", this cottage style can be found throughout New England and is the simplest of all the Colonial Houses. Primarily a product of the late 17th and 18th centuries, the plan consists of a central chimney with a room on either side and a long narrow room to the rear.

5: "Cape Cod Cottage" on Pleasant Valley Road, Groton; and first-floor plan of a similar house, after Williams.

The "garrison" Colonial is the fifth phase, and is typified by a corbelled or framed front overhang. This style predominates in river towns near Hartford or in communities which were influenced by, or settled as part of, the New Haven colony. In western and northeastern Connecticut, the style is limited to overhangs in the gable end.

6: House with typical gable-end overhang, Scott Hill Road, Bozrah.

Many variations of the above five basic types exist. Some of the houses began as "half houses" or "three-quarter houses," which were intended to be completed as typical central chimney plan houses. The "half house" consisted of either a pair of rooms or a single room on one side of the chimney, and resembles in plan the earliest one-room houses of the settlers. The "three-quarter house was built with one large room and one smaller room flanking the central chimney. Many of these houses had a rear lean-to added at a later date. The use of the hip roof was experimented with during this time, usually with a single chimney piercing the middle of the roof, but this roof form was soon discarded and did not reappear until the late Georgian and Federal periods.

The central chimney plan continued as the most common type of dwelling until the middle of the 18th century, when it was replaced by a more workable and convenient layout, which brought about the transitional phase of Colonial building.

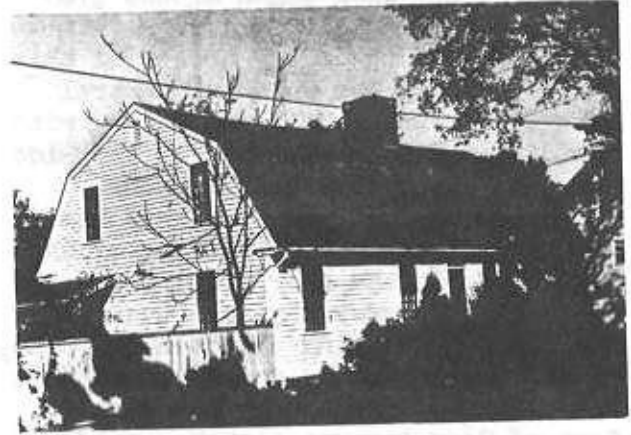

The sixth and final phase of Colonial building is the center hall plan. The typical room arrangement of this period consisted of a wide hall extending the entire depth of the house, from the centered front door to a rear secondary door. This rear door often led to the kitchen, which was almost always included in a separate wing to the rear of the main house. The large single chimney of the central chimney plan has been replaced by a pair of chimneys which serve the double rooms on either side of the center hall. In plan, the center hall house resembles two central chimney plan houses joined together on the long side by the center hall. This does not carry through in elevation, however, since the center hall house retains the ridge line along the longitudinal axis.

The center hall plan is the beginning of the formal, balanced plan which will continue through the Georgian period, and is almost the only plan in use between 1750 and the turn of the century.

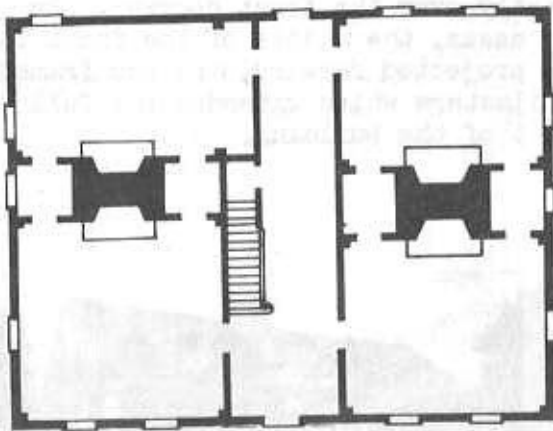

The gambrel-roofed house is also included in this phase of building. The gambrel-roofed house originated in the 1750's, and takes a variety of forms. Some Gambrel-roofed houses include a lean-to addition, and resemble a Saltbox in character.

9: Gambrel-roofed house on Main Street, Stonington Village.

The central chimney and center hall plan houses were the most common houses built in the Colonial period in the state, and variations such as gable-end chimney plans and the more elaborate Dutch and Flemish Colonial plans that flourished in the Hudson Valley were the exception and not the rule of Colonial buildings in Connecticut. With the advent of the center hall plan, domestic architecture began a state of transition to the more formal and elaborate building form known as Georgian.

8: Center-hall plan house on Ross Hill Road, Lisbon; and first-floor plan of a similar house, after Kelly.

THE GEORGIAN STYLE

Reflecting an expanding and growing economy and an increased sense of security, the Georgian house is the first form of domestic architecture in the United States to introduce classical forms and motifs into the overall design. The difference between the earlier Colonial style of building discussed above and the Georgian style has been termed "the difference between folk art and classical design," and this is an apt description of the changes that were taking place in the beginning of the 18th century. Spanning the entire century, the Georgian period is usually broken down into three phases, Early, Middle, and Late or Post Colonial.

Early Georgian began around 1700 and continued until the 1750's. In plan, many of the early houses of this period were of the Colonial central chimney or center hall varieties, with one distinguishing feature — the wide paneled, often very ornate, door. Above the door, a row of lights was usually placed in the transom, or in some cases in the door itself, and the entire doorway may have been enclosed by flanking pilasters of Doric, Ionic, Corinthian or composite orders. Crowning the entrance in the earlier form of Georgian was either a molded cap, or more often a broken scroll or segmental pediment. The roof was a low gable, with some use of the gambrel roof at a later date. The traditional plain eaves of the Colonial period were replaced by a classic cornice, which, with the door, are the most distinguishing features of the style.

Many houses of Colonial design were adapted to this new feeling of classical design by the simple addition of a new door, window frames capped with small, flat cornices, giving the visual effect of an architrave, and a finely detailed cornice.

10: Early Georgian house on Harvey Road, Stonington.

The middle phase of Georgian began in the 1750's and ended with the Revolutionary War. Retaining the central chimney and center hall plans, detailing reflected academic trends developed in England and spread to the Colonies in the form of a number of "Builder's Handbooks." Georgian houses became more imposing, but the entrance continued as the most important visual element with a triangular pediment replacing the scroll or segmented pediment of the earlier stage. The Corinthian order was little used in this period, and almost all of the pilasters were of Doric or Ionic detail. This is the beginning of the transitional form of Georgian that continued until 1800, where the complex mouldings and elaborate pediments and cornices were replaced with more massive, simpler, yet still classical, forms. Most of the very ornate doorways, with their flowing "swan neck" or broken pediments, are of this period.

The Late or Post Colonial phases of Georgian began at the close of the Revolution and merged with the Federal style, which made its appearance around the turn of the century. Typical of this phase of building was the geometric facade, conservative in design except for fenestration which now included the elliptical fan window and, more importantly, the Palladian window, usually found directly over the front doorway. In many cases, the middle of the front facade projected forward, and was framed by pilasters which extended the full height of the building.

11: Late Georgian house on Ross Hill Road, Lisbon.

THE FEDERAL STYLE

Roof forms vary from the common gable roof, with the ridge running parallel with the street, to the use of the gambrel roof - of which the County Courthouse in New London (NRHP), built in 1784, is one of the best examples in the entire country - to minor variations such as the jerkin head roof. It was also in this period that the balustraded hip roof which was to gain so much favor in the Federal period emerged.

12: Georgian style New London County Courthouse, built in 1784, New London.

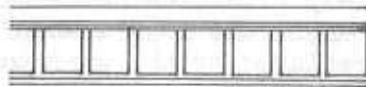

13: Hip-roofed Georgian house, North Stonington Village.

More properly called the Post Colonial period, the Federal style of building began immediately after the Revolution and continued until the 1830's when it was abruptly replaced by the enormously popular Greek Revival.

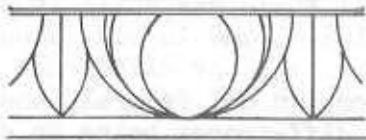

The Federal style was still in the Georgian tradition, and in many cases it is difficult to tell the difference between late Georgian and Federal, the only apparent differences being in detail. The detail, while still classical, becomes more refined and lighter in feeling, and the doorway remains as the key distinguishing feature. The entranceway exhibited a great variety of treatment, including the Palladian or Venetian window, but was marked by the introduction of the elliptical fanlight, which was extended to enclose the flanking sidelights and was supported by lighter yet more decorative adaptations of the Doric, Ionic, Corinthian and composite pilasters and columns. One-story porticos and porches were now used with more frequency. After 1810 two-story porches with full length columns also appeared, and the plan was sometimes modified to include projecting, curvilinear bays. The plan, while often continuing as the center hall plan, now begins to reflect a more functional arrangement of space, using curved interior walls, alcoves and elliptical rooms to create a more interesting interior.

The detail of the windows is another distinguishing feature of the Federal style. Previously the upper floor windows were framed directly into the cornice, but in this period, a clear break between window head and cornice is evident. This space widened with time, and the heads were often made to resemble stone by the inclusion of a key stone or corner blocks in a flat lintel. The cornice and other trim were of extremely delicate form, and the use of dentils, egg and dart and pearl mouldings, garlands, reeding and the carved or cast frieze, consisting of sunbursts, groups of figures or rope garlands now emerged in full array.

THE GREEK REVIVAL STYLE,

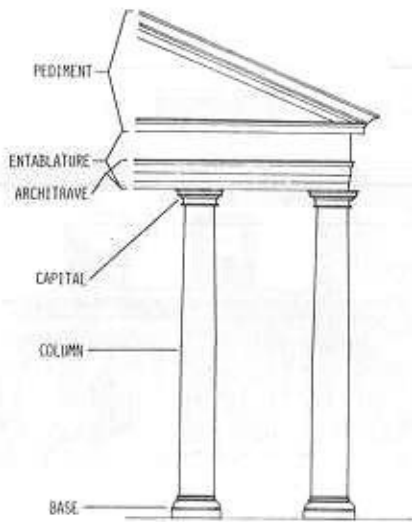

C. 1820 - C. 1850

Prompted by a desire to identify with the ideals of classic Greece and the Greek War for Independence, and bolstered by a new knowledge of Greek antiquities, the builders of the early 19th century were to dramatically change their architectural style almost overnight. Although there were few trained architects at this time, especially those willing to work on less than the great public buildings being constructed, the first "pattern books" and builder's guides were now readily available. Armed with complete plans, elevations and construction details, the relatively untrained builders of the period were to create many fine examples of this new, ultra-refined style.

Many of the early Greek Revival buildings in Connecticut exhibit a mixture of Federal and Post Colonial elements. The transition from these earlier styles to the Greek first appeared as embellishments to what still remain as basically Colonial building forms. The typical deep, simple cornices, flat or paneled corner pilasters, pedimented doorways and window caps were applied as mere architectural detailing to the familiar central hall and center chimney plan houses of the late 18th century.

In contrast to the delicate, ornate detailing of the Federal period, Greek Revival detail was usually massive and bold, and marked by a plainness that lent an air of determination and permanence to even the simplest farmhouses. Often called an age of "white architecture," this style was particularly effective in public buildings and in the larger homes of the wealthy merchants of the coastal towns. But as can be seen scattered throughout the towns, villages and rural areas, the Greek Revival style was quickly adapted and modified to fit local needs. Where the classic Greek temple form, with an entablature supported by massive two-story Doric, Ionic or Corinthian columns could not be used, a simple portico or pediment with flat corner pilasters would suffice.

By the 1820's the Greek Revival style had evolved as the new building vernacular, and rapidly replaced the typical one or one and one-half story cottages.

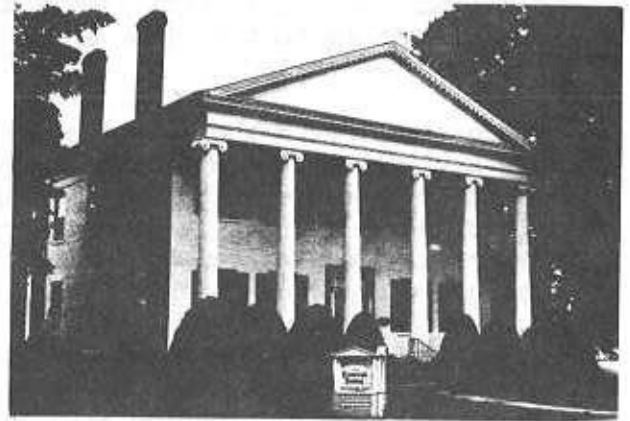

15: Components of a Greek Revival portico.

The doorway, flanked by paneled pilasters and topped by a flat, narrow window would be placed in one end. The raking cornice would be carried across the gable end to form a pediment, with paneled or possibly fluted pilasters at the corners. In many instances, the architrave under the eaves would have frieze or "eyebrow" windows punched into it, and as much as any single feature, this type of window treatment identifies even the simplest Greek Revival house.

The most impressive houses of this period are the classic temples. The Coit Houses, commonly referred to as "Whale Oil Row" (NRHP) in New London are excellent examples of the more elaborate Greek Revival that flourished in the 1830's and 1840's. This row of four houses, now restored, stands as one of the region's most important groups of historic buildings.

16: Greek Revival buildings, Whale Oil Row, New London.

17: Greek Revival hexastyle building, 19 South Main Street, Colchester.

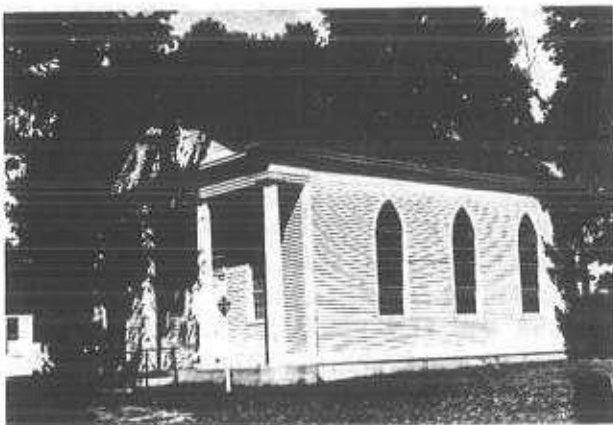

While the lack of freedom in planning was accepted as a condition in using the Greek Revival style, an expanding notion of the "Picturesque" eventually led to the decline of this simple, refined building style. Many owners of essentially Greek houses were attracted to the freedom of design afforded by the so-called Romantic styles now in vogue. Classic columns were replaced by thin delicate posts and the familiar carved or pierced woodwork now known as "gingerbread" was added wherever desired, offering a visual display of the changing tastes as the 19th century passed its mid-point.

ROMANTIC REVIVAL AND VICTORIAN
STYLES, C. 1840 - C. 1900

Greek Revival detail gave way to the detail of the newer "Romantic" styles with more finality and abruptness than Federal and Post Colonial detail gave way to the Greek, and the change is easily recognized throughout Connecticut. Until only recently the styles of the mid- and late 19th century were looked on with disfavor and dismissed as the "dark age of American architecture," but there has been a growing appreciation for these expressive and highly personal styles, and the many buildings that remain are living testimony to the vigor and variety of the period.

Concurrent with the height of the Greek Revival in the 1830's and 1840's, the Romantic Revival, then popular in England, began to find followers here in America. Gothic Revival in its true form was a stone architecture, but like the Greek, Gothic details were easily transferred to wood, leading to an infinite variety of decorative forms. The fascination with the Gothic detail, best suited to churches, was to spread to even the rural areas, and many small churches were built in a basically Greek temple form, but with pointed windows and other "Gothic" trim.

18: Greek Temple form building with Gothic windows, Town Hall, Salem.

Residential buildings of this period are represented by a number of the Italianate style houses. This type of house had numerous variations, but the most prominent feature is the freedom of planning which allowed for the inclusion of bays, gables, cupolas and deep porches, with a variety of roof forms, running from the nearly flat to the absurdly steep. The most distinctive feature of the Italianate house was, however, the decorative brackets which were placed in the wide overhanging eaves. These brackets, now mass produced by new millwork machines, appear on many houses around the state. The more elaborate houses were topped by a cupola.

19: Italianate style Merry Hall, Shore Road, Stonington.

The more impressive form of Italianate, known as "Tuscan Villa," complete with tower and picturesque massing, appears with less frequency.

20: Tuscan Villa house at 154 Washington Street, Norwich.

The "Carpenter Gothic" style is more common and is characterized by steeply pitched roofs, pointed windows and often, in an attempt to heighten the vertical effect, board and batten siding. One of the finest examples of this style is the small Gilead Church on the north frontage road of Interstate Route 95 in the Town of Waterford. Railroad stations are frequently examples of "board and batten" treatment, but numerous good examples of "Carpenter Gothic" are applied to residential buildings.

21: Carpenter Gothic style Gilead Church on the north frontage road of Interstate Route 95, Waterford.

23: "Bargeboard" trim on house at 248 Broad Street, Norwich.

22: Carpenter Gothic style house on West Mystic Avenue, West Mystic.

Almost always, the pointed gable ends of the "Carpenter Gothic" houses include highly decorative, carved scrollwork, called "bargeboards." This detail is often of considerable visual interest and is unmistakably characteristic of this period.

The "Romantic" styles of the middle of the 19th century were replaced by the more exuberant and eclectic "Victorian" as building activity began again after the Civil War. In this category fall structures ranging from the sober brick and stone mansions and public buildings of "Romanesque" proportions to the fanciful eclectic agglomerations of the later decades of the century. As in the "Romantic Revival," many variations of Victorian buildings are present in Connecticut, including the French Second Empire, or "Mansard" style, the "Romanesque Revival," the Victorian Gothic and the various styles often referred to as "American Craftsman."

The "French Second Empire" is characterized by the "mansard" roof, which often was punctuated by a variety of dormer window forms and capped with a cast iron parapet or walkway. The more common Second Empire style in Connecticut is exemplified by the brick or wooden residences with their liberal use of carpenter details, especially spindle posts, balusters and eaves brackets. The house shown in Photo 24 is an example of this type.

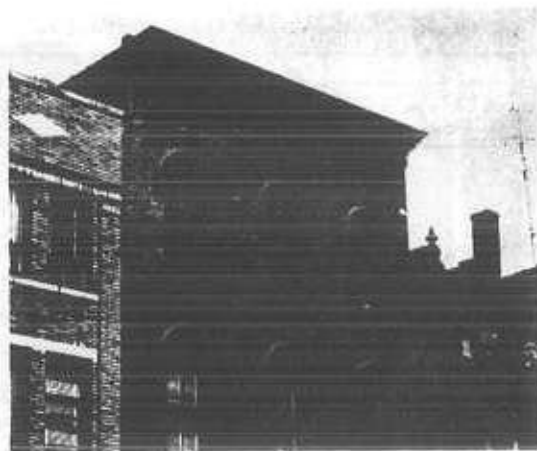

24: Second Empire style house at 257 Broadway, Norwich.

The "Romanesque Revival" can be seen in two distinct forms. First is the somewhat utilitarian brick style used for many of the commercial buildings in such cities as Norwich and New London. Many of these structures were built before the Civil War, but the use of brick in a sculptural sense, and Renaissance detailing, is typical of this period. The simplest of these buildings has a "corbel table" of bricks which create the cornice, and may be used with pilasters that are slightly raised from the main surface of the building. The windows may be embellished with decorative caps, the cornice may be further defined by the use of brick or metal brackets, as shown below, and may make use of a number of other purely decorative details such as quoins or prefabricated cast iron facades on the ground floor.

26: Romanesque Revival commercial building on Main Street, Norwich.

The more impressive form of "Romanesque Revival" that appears in the region is sometimes referred to as the "Richardsonian Romanesque." H. H. Richardson's style was widely imitated during the 1870's and 1880's. Northeastern Connecticut has two examples of this most important American architect's work in the Railroad Station (NRHP) and the Public Library (NRHP) in New London.

27: Union Station, New London, H.H. Richardson, architect.

28: Public Library of New London, H.H. Richardson, architect.

The "Victorian Gothic" style, characterized by pointed arches, steeply pitched roofs with correspondingly peaked gables, an attempt to make the typical wood siding appear as stone, and the use of contrasting colors in the trim, is the style referred to as "Charles Addams," 29: Victorian Gothic style Charles A. Converse house at 185 Washington Street, Norwich.

One of the most overlooked styles of the Victorian period is the highly decorative "American Craftsman," with its sub-styles such as the "shingle style" that is so prevalent in the coastal summer residence areas of New England. Shingle style might be thought of as adaptation of the masonry "Richardsonian" style to the more workable and less costly wood frame construction.

In the American Craftsman style, the emphasis is on the freedom of planning and massing, with liberal use of such appendages as porches, bays and exaggerated roof forms. Gable ends, the exterior walls themselves and porches are targets for the use of elaborately carved, sawn, and turned wood details. The siding, if shingles, is often arranged in an infinite variety of patterns the "bargeboards," a holdover from the "Carpenter Gothic" period, are screen-like in effect, and the eaves and posts of the verandahs are very ornate. One of the best examples anywhere of the type of decorative wood-working of this period is the Deacon Palmer House in Noank, which has a wooden screen depicting a good portion of Aesop's Fables enclosing the impressive porch. A charming disregard for convention is exhibited in these houses, which are among the more significant architectural works of the last two decades of the 19th century.

CHURCHES, PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND INDUSTRIAL ARCHITECTURE

No inventory of the architecture that exists in Connecticut would be complete without mention of the many fine churches, public buildings, and industrial buildings that were constructed throughout the 18th and 19th centuries.

As stated in Connecticut, a Guide to its Roads, Lore, and People: "The first church edifices were seldom more than large houses in appearance" and the meeting house of the Long Society Congregational Church in Preston, the earliest church now standing in the State, confirms this thought. Begun in 1726, the church was extensively renovated in 1819 and was the subject of an exceptional restoration project completed by the Long Society a few years ago.

32: Long Society Congregational Church, Preston.

At the turn of the 19th century, the classical influence was in full swing, and the tower, which previously occurred only on the State, or Congregational Church, now became an important design element. The Connecticut Guide suggests that "The golden age of church architecture here (the state) came not in the strictly 'Colonial' period, but in the years from 1810 to 1825." Influenced by the work of James Gibbs and Sir Christopher Wren in England, the tower now began to take octagonal as well as the more familiar square form and in many instances was "given a degree of embellishment never before seen in New England."

Church architecture changed along the same lines as did residential building of the same periods, and a number of distinctive churches of later periods are to be found. Varied examples of the Colonial and Greek Revival forms were applied to church buildings. The Gothic Revival is also abundantly represented and even examples of the Romanesque Revival and Victorian periods can be found.

In addition to churches and public buildings a number of other interesting building types exist. The numerous textile mills, many complete with good will housing, are of great importance to the economic history of the state as well as being good examples of the 19th century industrial architecture.

The Groton Monument, Fort Griswold, Fort Trumbull, and the lighthouses along the coast should also be mentioned as examples of early American building forms.

As the preceding discussion indicates, the state of Connecticut is extremely fortunate for retaining this great variety of historic architecture. The region must take immediate steps to insure that this diversity of architectural and historic resources remains as a most valuable contribution to the culture and heritage of the people of the state. Towards this end, Volume II identifies the special resources on a thematic and town-by-town basis.

Addendum

The following historic resources are to be included in The Inventory:

DURHAM- Middlesex County

Austin, Moses, House (Ar-18)(S&E)(C)

111 Main St.

Birthplace of Moses Austin, father of the founder of the State of Texas. House built by Elias Austin, 1743. Two story and attic, clapboard-sided frame structure, having main facade of five-bay width. Main facade enframed by pilasters of Classical character, similar pilasters supporting entablature decorate main entrance portal. Ground floor fenestration appears altered in 19th-century. Porch on main and side elevations is late 19th-century work.

Chauncey Homestead(Ar-18)

Fowler Ave.

Built 1755 by Rev. Nathaniel Chauncey, first Durham minister and first graduate of Yale College; 2 1/2 story, clapboard-sided frame, gambrel-roofed structure of generous proportions, much altered; five-bay symmetrical main elevation. Main entrance portal much altered in Federal period. 2-story wing of Greek Revival character has been added to left rear side, and an open porch spans the west elevation.

Fairchild-Merwin House(Ar-18)

Haddam Quarter Road

2 1/2 story, colonial saltbox residence, having appended lean-to and fieldstone central chimney intact; substantial overhang appears at second floor ceiling level on side elevations. Main elevation is five-bay width and symmetrical in proportion. Main entrance portal is flanked by a plain moulded architrave, surmounted by a six-pane transomlight, possibly later work. Sash is mostly replacement of original fabric.

Goodrich, Rev. Elizur, House(Ar-18)

42 Main Street

A description in 1935 states that this two-story frame house was unchanged from the time of construction, however a massive stone central chimney has been replaced by one of concrete block. Evidence of fine craftsmanship is seen in crown mouldings below the overhangs at first and second floors, which are brought forward above the window heads. Elaborate and detailed frontispiece appears genuine, with incised rosettes above the pilaster caps. Door is replacement as are all window sashes. Foundation is of regularly cut blocks of sandstone; most clapboard siding appears original.

Lyman House(Ar-18)

Middlefield Road

2 1/2 story, clapboard-sided frame structure with one story, plus attic, side ell; built 1759 by Thomas Lyman who received inspiration for house plan from viewing domestic architecture in colonial Virginia. The stately structure, with its hip roof, brick chimneys, and 12/12 windows, is dignified and symmetrical. The central hall extends the full depth of the house, with massive brick chimneys located to either side of the central hall. Restored in mid-1950's.

Merwin, Daniel, House(Ar-18)

130 Main Street

This center-chimney, 2-story, clapboard-sided frame house, was reputedly built in 1721. It is of traditional plan. Although extensively altered, it retains much of the 18th-century character. Modifications include 19th-century wood-shutters, aluminum storm sash and front door, composition shingle roof, and an enclosed porch added in the late 19th-century. Most windows are apparently early 19th-century work. Central chimney is a replacement of original work, but simulates the character of the original in proportions and material.

Swathel, John, House(Ar-18)

Maple Ave.

Georgian-style, 2-story, clapboard-sided frame residence, of traditional five-bay facade arrangement(main). A low gable roof surmounts this central-hallway plan residence, and two corbelled brick chimneys pierce the roof at either side of the central hallway. A palladian window with sidelights appears in the second story above the main entrance, and a fanlight surmounts the main entrance. A pedimented portico of Classical character shelters the main entrance, supported by thin wood Doric columns. The structure is placed on a fieldstone foundation. Rear additions and ells are later.

Wadsworth, James, House(Ar-18)

Main Street

Built 1752 by Isreal Goddard. It is a vernacular farmhouse structure of interesting, although undistinguished architectural character. The residence is two stories(with attic)in height, having a low-pitch gable roof. Main facade is three bays in width, having a main entrance centered in the ground floor of the main elevation. Documentation in 1935 indicated that structure possessed original hand-riven pine shingles on the exterior walls. Certain elevations have been clapboard-sided. Two, one-story wings have been added,extenxing at right angles from the side elevations at the rear.

NEW FAIRFIELD -Fairfield County

Barnum, Samuel, House(Ar-18, Ar-19)

Rt. 37 at Sawmill Road

Built 1771, and converted to Greek Revival temple style residence in 1831. Impressive two-story portico across main elevation. Pilasters support large entablature on main elevation, and divide facade into three equal bays. Two-story, frame construction, clapboard sided.

WINDSOR LOCKS - Hartford County

Windsor Locks (IA)

Canal Locks, 19th-century

East side Canal, opp. Webb St at
Rt. 5A

Dexter, C.H. and Sons, Paper Mill(IA)

E.side Canal, opp. Elm St., at Rt. 5A

late 19th-century industrial site, present use as paper mill, brick construction, commercial Romanesque style, rectangular plan, Distinctive rounded window heads and corbelled brickwork at cornice.

William Bulkley House, 824 Harbour Road: Built prior to 1766, one of few homes in district to escape British raid in 1779, 2-story residence, having large central chimney, plain pitch roof. Structured sided in wood shakes, many original still survive. Many contemporaneous outbuildings. 8. Wakeman Meeker Jr. House, 25 Westway Road: Typical mid 19th village house, High Victorian Gothic style. 9. Edwin Sherwood House, 95 Westway Road: Sherwood engaged in trade between Savannah and New York in early 19th century. 10. Charles Perry House, 564 Harbour Road: Built 1835, Greek Revival style residence, restored to original appearance in 1926,	Fairfield	Fairfield

11. The Bulkley Houses: 14 Westway Road, 104 Main Street, 142 Main Street, 114 Westway Road, 892 Harbour Road. These houses built by the shipping firm of E. Bulkley and Sons for the owner and various sons who inherited the business. All are mid 19th century, High Victorian Gothic, but many altered.
- /2. William Burr Dimon House, 187 liestway Road: Saltbox house, modified prior to 1818, in Georgian tradition.
13. 95 /gain Street: Built about 1827 as an Academy, this house also served as a place of worship and as town hall, substantially altered.
14. Samuel Bradley House, 450 Harbour Road: Built in 1715, Colonial Saltbox, moved from East Haven, Conn. in 1945-48.
15. Nichols Houses: 155 Rose Hill Road: 494 Harbour Road, 534 Harbour Road. All residences of Nichols family, built 1780-1836,
16. Benjamin Pomeroy House, 658 Pequot Road: Built 1861-63, Second Empire style, Ganaliel Bradford, builder.
17. 418 Harbor Road: Built about 1857 by Bridgeport firm of Lambert and Bunnell, Second Empire style.
18. Curtis House, 385 Harbor Road: Second moire style, built 1854, extensively altered 1920 and 1940.
19. Oliver Bulkley House, 176 Hain Street: Queen Anne style, built about 1875.
20. 45 Westway Road: Greek Revival style residence,
21. 678 Pequot Road; Greek Revival style residence.
22. Augustus Jennings Store, now residence, 798 Harbour Road: Built 1850's.
23. Tide Eill Building, 95 Harbour Road: Site of grist mill from 1722 to about 1920, extensively altered.
24. 668-670 Harbour Road: Built 1834, certain portions may date from 1814. Building has been residence, meat market, poet office.
25. Pequot Library, 720 Pequot Ave.: Romanesque style library building, built 1894.
26. Julius Pike House, 62 Center Street: Greek Revival style residence, built 1837, Done columns removed, but main house block retains integrity of Greek Revival form.

Built 1875-1876 by H. H. Richardson in Richardsonian Romanesque style of architecture. Rough-faced blocks of Berea limestone give the exterior a rugged appearance and the five rounded-arch cavellike openings at street level are typically Richardsonian. Bands of ornamented fluting divide the structure into three major areas, all of which contain arches of different sizes and groupings. Extensive alterations include the removal of upper stories and complete interior reworking.
